Abstract

Mong Reththy is an agribusiness industrial group of companies headquartered in Phnom Penh, Cambodia with total revenue of approximately US$48 million from 9 divisions. The purpose of the project is to describe background of this company and the Camerica consulting group working with them. Further, to illustrate the index of the Mong Reththy website and examine the English language narrative used. The purposes of the website both locally and globally are examined and sample narrative for improvement is presented.

Introduction and Background

Cambodia struggles to rebuild itself after 30 years of civil strife and warfare, including the genocidal Khmer Rouge period and the isolation and neglect by the international community. Life expectancy is only in the mid – 50s. Infant mortality stands at 95 per 1,000 childbirths. 85% of Cambodians live in rural areas where life is harsh and access to basic services is difficult. They depend largely on agriculture for their livelihoods. The agriculture sector accounts for 32% of the total economy. For the most part, agricultural products are exported as raw materials with limited value added. (USAID and Cambodia: Retrieved on March 1, 2002 at http://www.usaid.gov/regions/ane/newpages/one_pagers/cambodia01a.htm)

Most value added manufacturing of these raw materials takes place after export to Malaysia, Singapore and Thailand. Mong Reththy is vitally interested in the feasibility of manufacturing facilities in Cambodia in order to export more valuable agricultural products at substantially higher prices. In effect, managing more of the supply chain before exports leaves Cambodia, increasing overall revenues and strengthening the young developing Cambodian economy. Mong Reththy manages logistics of the supply chains of four specific agricultural commodity products: palm oil, tapioca, rubber and grapes.

Need - Cambodia is a post-conflict country, having suffered a protracted period of war, social upheaval and political turmoil for more than 20 years, starting first under the Lon Nol regime and then Democratic Kampuchea. During this period of upheaval, the administration system for policy formulation and implementation was destroyed. The socio-economic infrastructure such as roads, bridges, irrigation facilities among others were damaged and left in a badly neglected state. Human capital, which could have contributed to the development of the country, was decimated by massive purges, forced labor, disease, and bombing. Cambodia has a wartime legacy of millions of landmines still buried and new victims are being claimed even today. With regards to poverty, 35.9 percent of the population lives below the national poverty line and socio-economic indicators such as literacy, infant mortality rate and others are among the worst in the region.

Since Cambodia's admission to ASEAN in April 1999, the country has been enjoying an opportunity as well as facing the challenge of regional economic integration and competition at an increasingly intense pace. Website

A website such as that for Mong Reththy Group (See index page below) serves several purposes. Primarily it serves as a window to the world. An important public relations vehicle which the company can point to as pride to illustrate to potential suppliers, customers and other stakeholders – “here we are.” This company was eager to introduce themselves to a global audience with this device. It is not intended to manage the logistics of a supply chain or for transactory purposes of any type. Perhaps some day the economic need for such sophisticated utilization of software will be merited.

Two problems seem to show most significantly in this first attempt at a website. First, the company is Cambodian with predominantly Cambodian stakeholders and as such the website should speak to this local audience. The narrative seen on the index or “front page” was conceived in the Khmer language and subsequently translated into English. This English doesn’t speak so well to the local Cambodian audience. Agreed, the audience is not a group of home Internet users, but larger companies and government agencies that are much business cooperating partners. Versions of the narrative in several languages are recommended, but not the existing narrative. The entire website needs to be rewritten in say three languages: Chinese, Japanese and English; and completely redesigned and rewritten. The desired business communications or “impact message” is completely different in each language.

The second problem focuses on the website narrative intended for the global audience. The website originates from Cambodia whose language is not known much outside home borders, therefore English was chosen as a global website language. Unfortunately the translated Cambodian thought, which indeed comes from the heart, and speaks so very beautifully to the Cambodian people – does not “read” very well in English. The beauty of the narrative in native Khmer is somewhat like poetry. When translated directly into global English these thoughts from the heart give the reader a mixed reaction of quaint, odd and confusing.

The lesson is simple and important. When building a website for a local audience, and another one for the world. What the reader sees, reads, perceives and the resulting impressions are everything. When communicating meaningful values to a local audience, present them in the most meaningful way possible. When seeking commercial impact from a global audience, communicate as the global world of business communicates, in whatever language chosen for whatever audience.

necessary to change the tone, and meaning of the opening text.
